One of the best feelings is knowing that I have made a(n) 1 impact on another person's life.

During my freshman year, I got my first real job at Dunkin' Donuts. I quickly became aware that customers' 2 was important, so I tried to provide the best service that I could. I still remember one customer vividly, an elderly gentleman named Frank. He came in every Sunday afternoon and ordered a medium coffee with two old-fashioned donuts. Immediately after I saw him pull into the parking lot, I 3 his order, having it ready by the time he walked in. If I had no other work to do, I sat and talked with him. We learned a lot about each other. I could not help feeling sorry for him because his wife had recently passed away.

After a year of working every weekend, I eventually decided to leave and turned in my two-week notice. The most difficult part of 4 was not telling my boss, but informing Frank. I felt like I was 5 him. When I finally brought it up, he 6 replied, "Oh, that's too bad. I'm sure that the staff will miss you." I began to think that our visits held no real importance to him, and that he would be just as 7 enjoying his food alone. 8, on my last day, Frank came in with a card that simply read, "Your kindness during the time we have spent together is heartwarming. You had no 9 to speak a word to me, let alone show a real interest in our conversations. Few things have brought me more pleasure than our weekly visits. Thank you."

The amount of 10 I received for such minor efforts is mind-blowing. Giving up my weekends for a year was a small price to pay to grasp the remarkable effects of kindness.

I wrestled her to the ground for the keys. Literally. Indeed, when she opened the door to leave the house at 11 pm for the movies despite my words, I actually wrestled my 16-year-old daughter to the ground.

I did not know how to deal with a rebellious (叛逆的) teenager. We are a family of strong wills, from the top down. All my kids had pushed and argued. Everyone "kind of" followed the rules. As they got older, especially when they hit high school, I saw the power shifting, but it hadn't been so obvious. I had not seen much in-your-face rebellion.

Until this happened

I called Amy Speidel, a wise and practical parenting expert. She stayed on the phone with me and listened to my wild complaint about my disrespectful kid. She listened for almost two hours and then gave me some suggestions.

Amy told me that my daughter's behavior was "developmentally appropriate"—she was supposed to test the boundaries. Amy also said that it was great that my daughter would be able to stand up for herself in a relationship that wasn't working.

Those comments really made me feel awful. I hadn't considered anything positive about her behavior—but outside of our mother-daughter relationship, I would never want to devalue my daughter's strong will.

After talking with Amy, I realized that I was the one who needed help understanding discipline vs control. Honestly, I did hate that the responsibility was on me. I wanted permission to scream and punish. But I listened to Amy and here's what I learned.

1. My daughter's behavior was normal. That eased my fears that I had raised a terrible human and failed as a mother.

2. My daughter's strong personality was a strength. That revelation was a huge gift. I value her qualities but don't want them used against me. I will soften my response and listen to her.

3. I went crazy. In fact, I crossed a line. And that happens. But I learned to apologize and reset so that we could move forward.

My job, therefore, is to learn new responses that offer my daughter options and realistic consequences, not empty threats. And hopefully, this will change my relationship with my daughter.

24. What is the actual reason the author had a fight with her daughter?

- A. The daughter wouldn't give her the keys.
- B. The daughter didn't come back until 11 p.m.
- C. The daughter insisted on going out late at night.
- D. The daughter wanted to go to the movies with friends.

25. The comments made the author feel "awful" because _____.

- A. she had helped her daughter to test boundaries
- B. she didn't treasure the mother-daughter relationship
- C. she thought Amy was criticizing her daughter's upbringing
- D. she hadn't noticed the desirable aspects of her daughter's behavior

26. After the phone call, the author learned that _____.

- A. her daughter's strong character should be softened
- B. she should constructively deal with conflict
- C. her daughter should control her behavior
- D. she should admit her failure as a mother

27. According to Amy, what should the author say if the same situation happens again?

- A. "Do you really think you can just walk out the door like that?"
- B. "It's not safe to be out so late. What about tomorrow afternoon?"
- C. "It doesn't matter whether you go out or not. I will support you."
- D. "You have been disrespectful and can't go out tonight. Is that clear?"

C

Laughing together is an important way for people to connect and bond. And though the causes of laughter can vary widely across individuals and groups, the sound of a laugh is usually recognizable between people belonging to different cultures.

But what about animals? Do they "laugh"? And are the causes of animal and human laughter alike? In humans, people may laugh when they hear a joke, or when they see something that they think is funny, though it's unknown if animals' intelligence includes what humans would call a sense of humor.

However, many animals produce sounds during play that are unique to that pleasant social interaction. Researchers consider such vocalizations to be similar to human laughter. Recently, scientists investigated play vocalization to see how common it was among animals. The team identified 65 species that "laughed" while playing—most were mammals (哺乳动物), but a few bird species demonstrated playful laughter too. Reports of playful laughter were notably absent in studies describing fish, perhaps because there is some question as to whether or not play exists at all in that animal group. This new study could help scientists to analyze the origins of human laughter.

But how can we identify play? Unlike fighting, play is usually repetitive and happens independently of other social behaviors, said lead study author Sasha Winkler, a doctor of biological anthropology at the University of California. When it comes to identifying it, "you know it when you see it," Winkler told Live Science. One sign is that primates—our closest relatives—have a "play face" that is similar to the expressions of humans who are playing.

When Winkler previously worked with rhesus macaques, she had noticed that the monkeys panted (喘气) quietly while playing. Many other primates are also known to vocalize during play, she said, so a hypothesis (laughter in humans is thought to have originated during play) supported by the play-related panting laughter of many primate species was put forward.

People now still laugh during play, but we also integrate laughter into language and non-play behaviors, using laughter in diverse ways to express a range of emotions that may be positive or negative. Human laughter notably differs from other animals' laughter in another important way: its volume. People broadcast their laughter loudly, often as a way of establishing inclusion. By comparison, when most animals laugh, the sound is very quiet—just loud enough to be heard by the laughter's partner.

"It's really fascinating that so many animals have a similar function of vocalization during play," Winkler told Live Science. "But we do have these unique parts of human laughter that are also an important area for future study."

28. What is the main purpose of the passage?

- A. To explain causes of animal and human laughter.
- B. To assess complexities regarding animal laughter.
- C. To present findings on the existence of animal laughter.
- D. To analyze differences between animal and human laughter.

29. What can we learn from this passage?

- A. Animal laughter is even noticeable in fish.
- B. Animal laughter is hard to recognize during play.
- C. People have learned to combine play with laughter.
- D. People laugh loudly because they want to involve others.

30. What is probably the focus of future study on laughter?

- A. Distinctive features of human laughter.
- B. Different functions of animal laughter.
- C. The origin and development of human laughter.
- D. The relationship between animal laughter and intelligence.

D

Faced with an attempt by a new chatbot to imitate (模仿) his own songs, the musician Nick Cave delivered a strong response: it was “an absolutely horrible attempt”. He understood that AI was in its babyhood, but could only conclude that the true horror might be that “it will forever be in its babyhood”. While a robot might one day be able to create a song, he wrote, it would never grow beyond “a kind of burlesque (滑稽的模仿)”, because robots—being composed of data—are unable to suffer, while songs arise out of suffering.

Fans of Cave and his band will agree that his music is inimitable, but that doesn't mean they would necessarily be able to tell the difference. A few days before Cave's remarks, experts were asked to distinguish between four genuine artworks and their

AI imitations. Their conclusions were wrong five times out of 12, and they were only unitedly right in one of the four picture comparisons.

These are party games, but they point to an unfolding challenge that must be managed as a matter of urgency because, like it or not, AI art is upon us. The arrival of the human-impersonating ChatGPT might have increased general awareness, but artists across a wide range of disciplines are already exploring its potential, with the dancer Wayne McGregor and London's Young Vic Theatre among those who have created AI-based works.

A strongly worded report from Communications and Digital Committee (CDC) issued a wake-up call to the government, urging it to raise its game in educating future generations of tech-savvy professionals, and tackling key regulatory challenges. These included reviewing reforms to intellectual property law, strengthening the rights of performers and artists, and taking action to support the creative sector in adapting to the disturbances caused by swift and stormy technological change.

While developing AI is important, it should not be pursued at all costs, the CDC stressed. It deplored the failure of the Department for Digital, Culture, and Media to offer a defence against proposed changes to intellectual property law that would give copyright exemption (版权豁免) to any work, anywhere in the world, involving AI text and data mining.

The challenges of AI are both philosophical, as Cave suggested, and practical. They will unfold over the short and long term. State-of-the-art creative industries have a key role to play in shaping and exploring the philosophical ones, but they must have the practical help they require to survive and be successful. They need it now.

31. Why does the author mention the four picture comparisons in Paragraph 2?

- A. To stress the similarities between AI art and human art.
- B. To argue that human art will be replaced by AI art.
- C. To prove AI is stretching the boundaries of art.
- D. To imply AI art cannot be underestimated.

32. What does the underlined word "deplored" in Paragraph 3 probably mean?

- A. Clearly analyzed. B. Bravely suffered.
C. Strongly criticized. D. Accurately perceived.

33. What can be inferred from the passage?

- A. Some artists see AI as a tool even though it is a threat.
B. Creative industries are responsible for causing the AI problem.
C. Tech professionals need more training to better understand AI art.
D. The quality of AI art dismisses concerns about intellectual property.

34. Which would be the best title for the passage?

- A. The Creative Thief: AI Makes Perfect Art
B. AI in Art: A Battle That Must Be Fought
C. Threat or Opportunity: The Impact of AI on Art
D. The Rise of AI Art: What It Means to Human Artists

As a doctor, I can give you a lot of useful advice about how to get healthy and stay that way, but you don't need me to tell you that exercise is good for you. Staying active can benefit the heart, the waistline, even the mind. _____ More than 60% of American adults don't exercise regularly, and many say they don't exercise at all. More than 72 million are overweight, and almost all of them would like to lose the extra pounds. So, if exercise is such a good idea, why don't more people do it?

_____ 36 _____ Even as I write this, I am watching my two-year-old run around in circles. Kids seem to be born in constant motion, but along the way that behavior changes.

The slowdown occurs for most at the beginning of college. Academic pressure and lack of organized sports are certainly part of the problem. A bigger part may be looking at life changes as an occasion to blow up old rules and not create new ones in their place. 37 The demands of a new job usually mean less time at the gym. How about a new marriage? How many times have we seen just-married couples looking a lot heavier in first-anniversary photos than they did in the wedding pictures?

38 People who set general goals, like "I will exercise in my free time," did a far worse job of sticking to that plan than did people who made a firm commitment, like "I will walk to my friend's house and back every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday."

The good news is, there are solutions to all these. We can begin with exercises as simple as remembering to sit straighter or drink enough water. Specific workout plans can turn a general desire to exercise into a firm commitment. 39

We may never again have the energy of a two-year-old, but getting back even a little of our early-life energy can make our later lives a whole lot healthier.

- A. Being in college is certainly part of the problem.
- B. This is especially so when it comes to staying fit.
- C. Not having a clearly defined exercise plan can hurt.
- D. We often wish to go back to our two-year-old selves.
- E. For instance, you can schedule a weekly gym visit with friends.
- F. Still, there's a real disconnect between what we know and what we do.
- G. The most puzzling part of our inactive nature is that we don't start out that way.

第三部分：书面表达（共两节，32分）

第一节（共4小题：第40、41题各2分，第42题3分，第43题5分，共12分）

阅读下面短文，根据题目要求用英文回答问题。请在答题卡指定区域作答。

In the mornings, as I walked from the train station to the office, I planned my day by making a to-do list in my head: the scientific articles I would read, the data sets I would analyze, and—most urgent of all—the insights into human nature that it was my job to discover.

Each evening, I went back to the station, again going through my mental checklist but this time sizing up my performance against the expectations I'd set for myself that morning. Time and again, when comparing my to-do list with my got-done list, I felt disappointed because I had fallen short.

But one day, something very strange happened. During my trip home, without any conscious intent, my thoughts began to shift. Instead of feeling bad about my weaknesses, I said aloud very softly: I'm a nice person. I'm a nice person. I'm a nice person.

By the time I boarded my train, I was done with my little chant—until the next day when I walked home. And again, after counting my failures, I found myself saying quietly: I'm a nice person.

It turns out that there's a technical term for this practice: values affirmation. And what it boils down to is recognizing, and strengthening, the personal values you hold most dear.

When you affirm a core personal value, you shore up your sense of self-worth. You broaden your outlook: Instead of focusing on your shortfalls, you switch to a wide-angle view that includes your resources and opportunities. And the people who do this are happier, healthier, and more hopeful.

Over time, I made progress in my research and learned a lot about what makes most successful people special, including this: Nobody has passion and determination unless what they do lines up with their values.

Try values affirmation for yourself and teach the practice to your students. Take a moment and think of a value you hold dear, whether it's kindness, creativity, or gratitude. Whatever it is, name it. And then say to yourself: Come what may, I know who I am. Your values are your foundation and your compass, too. Trust them, and they will lead you home.

40. How did the author feel when she compared her to-do list with her got-done list?

41. What is values affirmation?

42. Please decide which part is false in the following statement, then underline it and explain why.

People who recognize their shortfalls are happier, healthier, and more hopeful.

43. Apart from speaking out positive words, what else could you do to feel better about yourself? (In about 40 words)
